UDC 791.43.03

Author: Zakharov Dmitriy Vladislavovich, post-graduate student, Cinema Studies Department, VGIKSummary: The article overviews the American cinema of the 1930 in terms of the “cyclic conception” stating that the life of American society is subject to a distinctive algorithm of public mood: “social restlessness” alternating with “private interest”. The author surveys gangster film, one of the dominating genres of the Depression cinema as exemplified by “The Public Enemy (1931, dir. William A. Wellman). The article also traces the links of the “social restlessness” films of the 1930s with the previous and subsequent phases stressing the problem of dividing each phase into stages: formation, prime and decline.

Author: Razgon Lyudmila Nikolayevna, post-graduate student, Cinema Studies Department, VGIKSummary: The article is devoted to the problem of re-creating the period in non-fiction cinema. A line is drawn between the two structural types based on the methods of representing and re-creating the time: the pattern containing some elements of a “total” screen spectacle and the edited method formed by re-structuring temporal links. Accordingly, the conceptual techniques and instruments pertaining to each pattern are described. The author concludes that both time structuring methods in non-fiction cinema correspond to different types of phenomena.

Key words: auteur's interpretation, poetic montage, observation method, duration, "total cinema", structure, meta-structure

Screen image. Aftereffect

UDC 791.43.01

Author: Poznin Vitaliy Fyodorovich, ScD, professor of TV Journalism, St. Petersburg State university

Summary: The article analyses the aftereffect, one of the aspects of screen image perception. Unlike the ordinary perception of the object's kinetic positions the aftereffect is not based on the analogy but on the contrast. It could be accounted for by the existence of two opposing visual perception systems in the human brain. This effect appears in the perception of both reality and screen image.

Key words: screen media, aftereffect, visual perception, film and audience, cinema, montage, color

UDC 18

Author: Nikitina Irina Petrovna, ScD, professor, History and Philosophy Department, VGIIK

Summary: The article describes the process of transforming the concept of "artistic space" into a category of modern aesthetics due to the work of various 20th century philosophers (O. Spengler, M. Heidegger, P. Florensky, etc.) The author argues that unlike the chronotope, which is a local notion relevant only for temporal arts, the notion of "artistic space" is universal and valid for all art-forms.
